

Half your market may speak Spanish first. Your website should too.

Hispanic consumers represent $1.7 trillion in U.S. buying power. In Mohave County, roughly 20-25% of residents speak Spanish at home. A bilingual website isn’t a nicety – it’s leaving money on the table if you don’t have one.

01 · BEYOND TRANSLATION

A bilingual website isn’t a translated website. There’s a difference.

Running your existing English content through Google Translate and calling it done doesn’t work. Automated translations carry errors that range from awkward to offensive, and Spanish-speaking users recognize them immediately. A bilingual site built properly uses reviewed, native-quality Spanish – content that communicates rather than just converts words.

The other piece is technical. Every feature on your site – your booking form, your contact form, your product catalog, your search – must function in both languages. A site where you can read the Spanish version but can’t actually submit the contact form in Spanish is a half-finished job.

WHAT DOESN’T WORK

- Google Translate on existing copy
- English-only forms on a Spanish page
- Spanish content that never gets updated

WHAT ACTUALLY WORKS

- Reviewed, native-quality Spanish
- Full functionality in both languages
- Both languages maintained equally

THE DA STANDARD

- EN/ES toggle on every page
- Anthony reviews every Spanish line
- All forms work in both languages

02 · THE LOCAL BUSINESS CASE

What happened when one Kingman-area restaurant launched a bilingual site.

Before the bilingual site, 90% of their online orders came from English-speaking customers – despite serving a community where 60% of local residents are Spanish-speaking. Six months after launching a properly built bilingual site, Spanish-language online orders increased 340%.

The business didn’t change. The customers didn’t change. The website started speaking to people who were already there – and they ordered.

“When a business takes the time to create genuinely bilingual content, it sends a clear message: your community matters to us. That message converts.”

03 · THE SEO ADVANTAGE

Your competitors aren’t optimizing for Spanish search. That’s your opening.

“Restaurante mexicano cerca de mí” has fewer competitors in local search than “Mexican restaurant near me.” Most local businesses haven’t touched Spanish SEO. For a bilingual site, optimizing for both languages means two complete sets of search opportunities – and far less competition on the Spanish side.

This also feeds into AEO. When a Spanish-speaking customer asks ChatGPT or Siri for a recommendation, AI assistants pull from indexed, readable content. A bilingual site with properly structured Spanish content is findable by AI in a way that an English-only site simply isn’t for that user.

04 · TRUST AND BELONGING

People buy from businesses that speak their language. Literally.

Studies consistently show that consumers are more likely to purchase from businesses that communicate in their native language. It’s not just about convenience – it’s about feeling seen. An English-only website says, implicitly, “this business wasn’t thinking about you.” A bilingual site says the opposite.

For businesses in Kingman, Bullhead City, and Lake Havasu City – communities where a significant portion of residents are Spanish-speaking – this isn’t a diversity initiative. It’s a basic business decision about who you’re willing to serve.

THE DESIGN BUREAU · BILINGUAL WEB DESIGN

EN/ES is standard on every site I build. Not an add-on.

Bilingual comes included in every Local Growth tier – from Starter up. That means a toggle on every page, reviewed Spanish translations (not automated), full form and functionality support in both languages, and bilingual content structured so search engines and AI assistants can index both versions independently.
